PROGRAM SHORTS

Col. Tim McCoy, star of Monogram's "Two Gun Justice," now at the theatre, is the only white man who knows the Indian sign language.

Col. Tim McCoy, star of Monogram's "Two Gun Justice," now at the theatre, blames crowded cities for killing off the Indians. An authority on Indian life, McCoy stated that they die off quickly when they desert the plains.

Betty Compsen, currently featured in Monogram's "Two Gun Justice," now at the theatre, is a vegetarian, eating only salads for lunch.

Tim McCoy is the star of this picture, and the supporting cast includes Joan Barclay and Lane Chandler.

OUTLINE OF THE STORY

(Not For Publication)

Bart Kane (John Merton) and his gang make themselves the law in Mesquite, and the whole countryside is suffering as a result of their ruthlessness. Sheriff Tate (Al Bridges) appeals to Tim Carson (Tim McCoy) for help, and Tim decides to desert his city office for the range again. He arrives in Mesquite disguised as a dread Spanish bandit "El Voltage"—the Vulture. In this way he makes friends with Bart and his gang, promising to join them. He meets Nancy Bowen (Joan Barclay) when the gang is about to horsewhip her father (Alan Craven), and Tim, in his own guise, saves him.

Kate (Betty Compsen) the owner of the dance hall, recognizes Tim dressed as El Voltage, but says nothing because she loves him. As Tim Carson, Tim spoils every plan of the gang's, for as "El Voltage" he finds out their every move. Finally Bart bribes El Voltage to kill Tim Carson, and Tim accepts the bribe. But Kate, jealous of his attentions to Nancy, reveals Tim's identity to Bart, and Tim is wounded. He is determined, however, to attend the murder trial of one of Bart's men, as he believes that once a member of the gang is actually brought to justice, Bart's power will be broken. He meets Bart on the way to the trial, but Kate, repentant and broken-hearted, saves his life by spoiling Bart's aim. Tim and Bart then shoot it out fairly, and Tim kills Bart. His work in Mesquite completed, Tim rides away then to go back to his city desk.

ITEMS !

The plot of Monogram's "Two Gun Justice," now at the theatre, is based on an episode in the life of the picture's star, Tim McCoy.

Others prominent in the cast include Betty Compsen, Joan Barclay, Tony Patton, and Lane Chandler.

John Merton, currently featured in Monogram's "Two Gun Justice," now at the theatre, has played the villain in twenty-six westerns already this year.

"Two Gun Justice" stars Col. Tim McCoy, and features Betty Compsen, Joan Barclay, and Lane Chandler.

Betty Compsen, old time favorite, is seen in the leading feminine role of "Two Gun Justice," the new Tim McCoy western epic at the theatre.

Fan Mail Gave Her Comeback Chance

The power of fan mail is so great that in more than one instance it has meant the professional life or death of a movie star.

Take, for example, the case of Betty Compsen, currently featured in Monogram's "Two Gun Justice," now at the theatre, who once used it as a weapon to fight with.

When Betty was forced to retire from the screen for two years because of illness, Hollywood said she was through. When she was ready to get started again, the producers weren't so eager to use an actress who had been absent for two years, until they saw her fan mail. Letters were piling up demanding Betty's return to the screen.

Monogram was the studio first to take the hint, and it featured Betty in rapid succession in five pictures. At the end of this time she was put under contract to Warner Brothers, made one picture there — "A Slight Case of Murder" — and returned to Monogram for "Two Gun Justice," starring Tim McCoy, in which she plays a woman who is defeated by a hopeless love.

Tim McCoy Actually Exposed Range Racket

What would you do if you were hired to kill yourself? This is the problem that faces Col. Tim McCoy in Monogram's "Two Gun Justice," now at the theatre, and it is also, page Mr. Ripley, one he has faced in real life.

McCoy's own life story would make an excellent movie. He has been twice decorated by the United States government for his invaluable work with the Indians. McCoy, a colonel in the United States Army, was sent to investigate housing and hospitalization conditions on the Reservations, because he was the only white man who could speak the Indian language and understood their customs and point of view.

It didn't take Tim long to realize that someone was in league with racketeers to collect graft from the housing and hospitalization fund. So Tim disguised himself as an Indian to learn the villain's identity. Then, in his own guise, during the day, he would carry on his official investigation.

And it wasn't long before the "man higher up" showed his hand by bribing Indian Tim to kill Colonel Tim, and this gave McCoy all the evidence he needed.

McCoy has often suggested that this page from his own life be used for a picture, but it was not until "Two Gun Justice" that it was. This is the story of a man's single-handed fight for law and order against a ruthless mob of men who are terrorizing the plains.

Prominent in the cast are Betty Compson, Joan Barclay, Earl Dwire, John Merton, and Tony Patton.

Maurice Conn produced for Monogram.

Tim McCoy, star of Monogram's "Two Gun Justice," now at the theatre, insists on having a different villain in all of his pictures, so he won't get used to disliking any particular actor.

Betty Compson, currently featured in Monogram's "Two Gun Justice," now at the theatre, retired from the screen because of illness two years ago. She intended never to return, but the demands of her fans through her fan mail, which had doubled, caused her to change her mind.

Col. Tim McCoy is the star of "Two Gun Justice."

"Two Gun Justice" Has Double-Barrelled Thrills

(REVIEW)

Smashing action characterizes Monogram's "Two Gun Justice," the Tim McCoy thriller which opened at the theatre. This is the exciting story of a man hired to kill himself, and it presents McCoy in a new type of character, one more complex than the usual western requires.

Tim is persuaded by the desperate ranchers of Mesquite to desert his city desk and return to the range to help them fight Bart Kane and his gang, foes of law and order, who are controlling the government through intimidation of its officials.

Tim enters Mesquite in disguise; he pretends he is the notorious Spanish bandit "El Voltage," the Vulture, and disguised as this character he wins the confidence of Kane, thus learning all the plans of the gang. In his own guise, as the feared Tim Hayes, he defeats these plans time after time, until Kane bribes "El Voltage" to kill Tim Hayes.

This tense situation develops into a thrilling climax as Kate, a woman whose love Tim had scorned, reveals his identity to the gang and they wait in ambush for "El Voltage."

Tim McCoy is given plenty of opportunity for action in this picture, and he comes through with a fine acting performance by giving two entirely different characterizations in his portrayal of both Tim Hayes and "El Voltage."

Betty Compson, an old favorite, invests true realism into her portrait of Kate, victim of a hopeless love, and John Merton, as Bart Kane, is a convincing villain. Others outstanding in the cast were Joan Barclay, as the girl who wins Tim's heart, Tony Patton, the stool-pigeon, and Alan Craven.

Maurice Conn produced for Monogram, and Alan James directed from the original screenplay by Fred Myton.

Joan Barclay, who plays opposite Tim McCoy in Monogram's "Two Gun Justice," now at the theatre, got her first break in pictures when the leading lady of a western troupe got sick on location at Joan's ranch. She stepped into the part.

Col. Tim McCoy, star of Monogram's "Two Gun Justice," now at the theatre, is the only western star who has a standing in.
